The resulting printer, called the Erector Maker, is a simple 3D printer that, thanks to a removable base plate, can print out objects at a variety of angles and with a variety of fixtures. The base plate is removable for printing objects larger than 3x3x4. It's also quite heavy, and looks quite nice, too. The printer is still in development, and plans call for it to reach a market price of $50. Printing with resin, wood, plaster, clay or even bamboo, the machine comes as an order-in-advance kit (about $150), and can be assembled at home. The print-out stands about six inches tall. The bed of the printer is set at an angle to print at right angles, but it can also be adjusted to print at various other angles. For those worried about the mess of finishing a printout, the printer produces a finished piece that is dry and hard, which can be scratched without leaving any dirt or dust, according to the product page. Check out the video below to see the Erector Maker in action.
