using azobenzene as a substituent. Laser-induced photodecomposition of azo dye was studied using azobenzene as a substituent. The effects of laser fluence, wavelength, and the azobenzene substituent on the total decay rate were analyzed. The rate of photodecomposition increased with increasing laser fluence at a given wavelength. At a given fluence, the increase in rate with the increase in wavelength increased up to the maximum and then decreased. The increase in decay rate with increasing fluence was similar for all tested dyes, i.e., NBB, BM, MTB, and MBB. The rate of photodecomposition with the azo dyes dissolved in glycerol, and the azo dyes dispersed in non-polar solvents such as toluene, hexanes, or mesitylene was higher than that observed in water at a given laser fluence. The rate of photodecomposition of the azo dye in water was similar to the measured rate
